A MASKED BALL

(Verdi)

Act I. “The Governor”. Friends and officers of Riccardo, Count of Warwick and Governor of Boston await him. As Riccardo enters, his young ensign Oscar gives him the guest list for a forthcoming masked ball. Seeing the name of Amelia — wife of his closest friend, Renato — he muses on his secret passion for her (“La rivedrà nell'estasi”). As the others leave, the ensign admits Renato, who says he knows the cause of Riccardo’s disturbed look: a conspiracy against the Governor (“Alla vita che t’arride”). But Riccardo ignores his friend’s warning. A magistrate arrives with a decree banishing the fortuneteller Ulrica, who has been accused of witchcraft. When Riccardo asks Oscar’s opinion, the youth counsels tolerance and describes her skill at fortune-telling (“Volta la terrea fronte alle stelle”). Deciding to see for himself and overruling the objections of Renato, Riccardo bids them all to join him in an incognito visit to the soothsayer.

“Ulrica”. After she has summoned the devil (“Re dell’abisso, affrettati”) before a group of women, Ulrica tells the sailor Silvano that he will soon prosper. Riccardo, disguised as a fisherman surreptitiously slips money and a promotion into the sachel of the seaman, who discovers it and marvels at the fortuneteller’s powers. Riccardo remains hidden when Ulrica sends her visitors away to grant an audience to Amelia, who comes seeking release from her fatal love for Riccardo. Ulrica tells her to find a magic herb that grows by the gallows (“Della città all’occaso”); Oscar enters with some of Riccardo’s friends and officers, and Riccardo, still incognito, asks Ulrica to read his palm; when she says he will die by the next hand he shakes, he laughs (“E scherzo od è follia”). Clasping the hand of Renato, who has just arrived, the Governor is recognised and hailed by all.

Act II: “Amelia”. Amelia arrives by the gloomy gallows to search for the magic herb (“Ma dall’arido stelo divulsa”). She is delirious with terror. Riccardo arrives. Unable to resist his ardent words (“Non sai tu che se l’animma mia”), Amelia confesses she loves him, but quickly veils her face when her husband rushes in to warn Riccardo to flee approaching assassins. Fearing that Renato may discover Amelia’s identity, Riccardo leaves, only after Renato promises to escort her back to the city without lifting her veil. Finding Renato instead of their intended victim, the conspirators curse their luck. Renato draws his sword when they make insolent remarks about his veiled companion; to prevent bloodshed, Amelia lets her veil fall. While the conspirators laugh at this ironic turn of events ("Ve' se' di notte qui colla sposa"), Renato bitterly deserts the Governor in their favour.

Act III: "Renato". Renato tells Amelia he intends to kill her; she asks to see her young son before dying ("Morrò, ma prima in grazia"). Granting her wish, Renato turns to a portrait of Riccardo and realises that Riccardo has betrayed him ("Eri tu"). Samuel and Tom arrive and all three form a pact to assassinate the Governor ("Dunque l'onta di tutti sol una"). Amelia returns just as the men prepare to draw lots to decide the issue. Forcing his wife to draw the fatal slip, Renato rejoices that it is his name. A moment later Oscar enters with an invitation to a masked ball to be given by the Governor. While the conspirators seize on this chance to execute their plan, Amelia determines to warn Riccardo of his danger.

"The Governor". Alone in his room, Riccardo resolves to send Amelia and Renato to England ("Ma sè m'è forza perderti"). Oscar delivers a letter to the Governor from an unknown lady, warning him of the murder plot; not wanting his absence to be taken as a sign of cowardice, Riccardo leaves for the masked ball.

"The Masked Ball". The three conspirators wander through the throng trying to learn the disguise of the Governor. Renato, taking Oscar aside, tries to persuade the youth to reveal the information. After playful evasions ("Saper vorreste"), Oscar betrays Riccardo. Riccardo speaks with Amelia; despite her repeated warning, he refuses to leave. Just as the lovers bid a final farewell ("T'amo, sì, t'amo, e in lagrime"), Renato, overhearing the last of their conversation, assassinates the Governor. The dying Riccardo forgives Renato, who learns too late of his wife's innocence. They realise that a golden age has passed.
